10 "Real World" Questions About Your Communications

- Do clients, associates and prospects ever complain that you are hard to reach, or that they aren't sure which number to call?
- Do you get frustrated with your associates always calling your cell phone first – often having to answer it when you're sitting next to your home or office landline phone?
- Do you ever feel the need to give out your cell, home or other private numbers at times to make sure you are available for an important call?
- Are you wasting time checking two or even three different voicemail systems?
- Have you ever wanted to leave someone a brief message, but hesitated to ring their phone because it was late at night or not a good time for you to get involved in a live conversation?
- When your phone rings and there is an unknown caller ID, do you hesitate to answer, but worry it could be an important call?
- Have you ever been so busy that you forgot to check your voice mail, then called in to find a message which you should have responded to hours sooner?
- Have you ever forwarded an important voicemail to an associate in your office, but wished you could also send a copy to other people who work in a different office or have a different voicemail system?
- Could you save time and be more productive if all of your voicemails, faxes, and emails were delivered to you by one system, making them all available when and where you need them?
- Do clients ever complain that they tried to fax you something, but your machine was busy?

Are you willing to try new technology, which can eliminate most or all of these problems for less than a dollar a day?
